Profile

Paul Jockimo provides consultation, instruction and support to governmental agencies, emergency response organizations and others, in developing new, as well as re-structuring, Peer Support teams and networks. The services include consulting on Critical Incident Stress Management (CISM), Line of Duty Death (LODD), team building and development, as well as motivational programs. His audiences generally consist of Emergency Services providers (such as Law Enforcement, Fire Service and EMS), Military personnel, Mental Health providers, Public Service, School and Hospital-based personnel as well as Clergy or faith-based providers.

When Paul was just seven, he was given the opportunity to help people with physical differences feel accepted and overcome challenges. As the subject of photojournalist Bernard Wolf's book "Don't Feel Sorry for Paul," Paul's story of adapting to life as a congenital quad amputee (Paul has just one finger, one thumb and one toe) was powerfully told through photos and narrative. In 1974, and in the decades that followed, his story was ground breaking and has inspired thousands to strive to achieve their potential and live a happy life. Paul's triumphs over his physical challenges paved the way for the peer support work he does today. His external differences helped form his deep compassion. He has a unique perspective on life that enables him to help others in the darkest of hours. Through his differences, we are given the gift of empathy and motivation.

In addition to being recognized as a leader in the field of Critical Incident Stress Management and Line of Duty Death, Paul V. Jockimo is well-known across the United States as a highly respected, moving and humorous motivational speaker.
